

GENDER VIOLENCE

A DEVELOPMENT AND HUMAN RIGHTS ISSUE

CHARLOTTE BUNCH
ROXANNA CARRILLO

CENTER FOR WOMEN'S GLOBAL LEADERSHIP

GENDER VIOLENCE

A DEVELOPMENT AND HUMAN RIGHTS ISSUE

WOMEN'S RIGHTS AS HUMAN RIGHTS:
TOWARD A RE-VISION OF HUMAN RIGHTS

CHARLOTTE BUNCH

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN:
AN OBSTACLE TO DEVELOPMENT

ROXANNA CARRILLO

CENTER FOR WOMEN'S GLOBAL LEADERSHIP

First printing: June 1991

Second Printing: October 1991

Third Printing: October 1996

© Copyright Charlotte Bunch, 1990

© Copyright Roxanna Carrillo, 1991

Designed by Cici Kinsman, C² Graphics, Brooklyn, New York

Produced by Rutgers Office of University Publications

GY98-96

Printed on recycled paper

PREFACE

This booklet, first published in 1991, was the first in a series of working papers on Women and Human Rights published by the Center for Women's Global Leadership. The series promotes international discussion of critical conceptual and strategic questions regarding women's human rights and the development of a human rights agenda that incorporates women's experiences. As the IV World Conference on Women in Beijing made clear, an understanding that women's rights are human rights has come a long way toward mainstream acceptance since 1991. It seems particularly fitting therefore that the Center publish anew this initial pamphlet which lays out the theoretical basis for our work on violence against women and women's human rights.

The two papers presented here developed out of the Center's work during its first two years. Both papers seek to move the discussion of gender based violence and "women's issues" forward by linking them to major agendas of the international community—human rights and development. This is part of a larger process in which women are working to end the separation of women's concerns from mainstream agendas.

For over two decades, women around the globe have been identifying and working on the particular concerns that affect our daily lives. Initially much of this effort went into describing and defining problems that were previously invisible or not viewed as matters of public policy, whether in areas like reproductive rights or women and development. Yet, these largely remained ghettoized as "women's issues," that were treated as lesser than questions of peace, democracy, human rights, the environment and development.

In the past few years, women have increasingly moved to claim these primary agendas as our own. Women are providing new perspectives on old questions as well as demonstrating that "women's issues" are not separate but rather are aspects of these concerns. Further, we see that by neglecting women's experiences and views, society has been kept further away from the common solutions that we need. For example, women are demonstrating that there cannot be peace in the world if there is violence at the core of society in the family, or demanding the recognition that there is no democracy if half the population is effectively excluded from political participation.

It is within this context that these two papers were originally written. "Women's Rights as Human Rights: Toward a Re-Vision of Human Rights" evolved out of several years of seminars, speeches, and discussion with many people about how to re-interpret human rights from a feminist perspective. It was originally published in English in HUMAN RIGHTS QUARTERLY (vol. 12, 1990). It has since been translated and published in many languages including Chinese, Dutch, French, Portuguese, Sinhala, and Spanish.

"Violence Against Women: An Obstacle to Development" resulted from a collaborative research project sponsored by the United Nations Development Fund for Women (UNIFEM), in conjunction with the Global Center. It was commissioned in order to reconceptualize violence as it affects development and to show how development planning cannot succeed if it ignores the ways that gender based violence hinders women's participation in development at many levels. It was originally published in this version in English by the Global Center in 1991. UNIFEM later revised it and added a resource section which they published in 1992 in English, French, and Spanish under the title, "Battered Dreams: Violence Against Women as an Obstacle to Development."

Many people were involved in the development of these papers and also helped to create the Center for Women's Global Leadership and thus enabled this publication. Our founding godmothers and advisors were Mary Hartman, then Dean of Douglass College and now Director of the Institute for Women's Leadership at Rutgers, and Ruth Mandel, then Director of the Center for the American Woman and Politics and now Director of the Eagleton Institute at Rutgers. While all those who have helped the Center to develop are too numerous to list here, special thanks for the original production of this booklet must be given to Roxanna Carrillo, Susana Fried, Niamh Reilly, Diana Gerace, Cici Kinsman, Lori Heise, and Susan Holcombe. Finally, I also want to thank Neida Jimenez and Linda Posluszny for insisting that we publish translations of this pamphlet as well as keep it in print in English and for doing the work necessary to make it happen.

Charlotte Bunch, Executive Director

CHARLOTTE BUNCH

WOMEN'S RIGHTS AS HUMAN RIGHTS: TOWARD A RE-VISION OF HUMAN RIGHTS

Significant numbers of the world's population are routinely subject to torture, starvation, terrorism, humiliation, mutilation, and even murder simply because they are female. Crimes such as these against any group other than women would be recognized as a civil and political emergency as well as a gross violation of the victim's humanity. Yet, despite a clear record of deaths and demonstrable abuse, women's rights are not commonly classified as human rights. This is problematic both theoretically and practically, because it has grave consequences for the way society views and treats the fundamental issues of women's lives. This paper questions why women's rights and human rights are viewed as distinct, looks at the policy implications of this schism, and discusses different approaches to changing it.

Women's human rights are violated in a variety of ways. Of course, women sometimes suffer abuses such as political repression in ways that are similar to abuses suffered by men. In these situations, female victims are often invisible because the dominant image of the political actor in our world is male. However, many violations of women's human rights are distinctly connected to being female—that is, women are discriminated against and abused on the basis of gender. Women also experience sexual abuse in situations where their other human rights are being violated, as political prisoners or members of persecuted ethnic groups for example. In this paper I address those abuses in which gender is a primary or related factor because gender-related abuse has been most neglected and offers the greatest challenge to the field of human rights today.

The concept of human rights is one of the few moral visions subscribed to internationally. Although its scope is not universally agreed upon, it strikes deep chords of response among many. Promotion of human rights is a widely accepted goal and thus provides a useful framework for seeking redress of gender abuse. Further, it is one of the few concepts that speaks to the need for transnational activism and concern about the lives of people globally. The Universal Declaration of Human Rights¹ adopted in 1948 symbolizes this world vision and defines human rights broadly. While not much is said about women, Article 2 entitles all to "the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration, without distinction of any kind, such as race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or other status." Eleanor Roosevelt and the Latin American women who fought for the inclusion of sex in the Declaration and for its passage, clearly intended that it would address the problems of women's subordination.²

Since 1948, the world community has continuously debated varying interpretations of human rights in response to global developments. Little of this discussion, however, has addressed questions of gender, and only recently have significant challenges been made to a vision of human rights which excludes much of women's experiences. The concept of human rights, like all vibrant visions, is not static or the property of any one group; rather its meaning expands as people reconceive of their needs and hopes in relation to it. In this spirit, feminists redefine human rights abuses to include the degradation and violation of women. The specific experiences of women must be added to traditional approaches to human rights in order to make women more visible and to transform the concept and practice of human rights in our culture so that it takes better account of women's lives.

In this article, I will explore both the importance and the difficulty of connecting women's rights to human rights, and then I will outline four basic approaches that have been used in the effort to make this connection.

I. BEYOND RHETORIC: POLITICAL IMPLICATIONS

Few governments exhibit more than token commitment to women's equality as a basic human right in domestic or foreign policy. No government determines its policies toward other countries on the basis of their treatment of women, even when some aid and trade decisions are said to be based on a country's human rights record. Among non-governmental organizations, women are rarely a priority, and Human Rights Day programs on 10 December seldom include discussion of issues like violence against women or reproductive rights. When it is suggested that governments and human rights organizations should respond to women's rights as concerns that deserve such attention, a number of excuses are offered for why this cannot be done. The responses tend to follow one or more of these lines: (1) sex discrimination is too trivial, or not as important, or will come after larger issues of survival that require more serious attention; (2) abuse of women, while regrettable, is a cultural, private, or individual issue and not a political matter requiring state action; (3) while appropriate for other action, women's rights are not human rights per se; or (4) when the abuse of women is recognized, it is called inevitable or so pervasive that consideration of it is futile or will overwhelm other human rights questions. It is important to challenge these responses.

The narrow definition of human rights, recognized by many in the West as solely a matter of state violation of civil and political liberties, impedes consideration of women's rights. In the United States the concept has been further limited by some who have used it as a weapon in the cold war almost exclusively to challenge human rights abuses perpetrated in communist countries. Even then, many abuses that affected women, such as forced pregnancy in Romania, were ignored.

Some important aspects of women's rights do fit into a civil liberties framework, but much of the abuse against women is part of a larger socioeconomic web that entraps women, making them vulnerable to abuses which cannot be delineated as exclusively political or solely caused by states. The inclusion of "second generation" or socioeconomic human rights to food, shelter, and work—which are clearly delineated as part of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights—is vital to addressing women's concerns fully. Further, the assumption that states are not responsible for most violations of women's rights ignores the fact that such abuses, although committed perhaps by private citizens, are often condoned or sanctioned by states. I will return to the question of state responsibility after responding to other instances of resistance to women's rights as human rights.

The most insidious myth about women's rights is that they are trivial or secondary to the concerns of life and death. Nothing could be farther from the truth: sexism kills. There is increasing documentation of the many ways in which being female is life-threatening. The following are a few examples:

- Before birth: Amniocentesis is used for sex selection leading to the abortion of more female fetuses at rates as high as 99 percent in Bombay, India; in China and India, the two most populous nations, more males are born than females even though natural birth ratios would produce more females.³
- During childhood: The World Health Organization reports that in many countries, girls are fed less, breast fed for shorter periods of time, taken to doctors less frequently, and die or are physically and mentally maimed by malnutrition at higher rates than boys.⁴
- In adulthood: The denial of women's rights to control their bodies in reproduction threatens women's lives, especially where this is combined with poverty and poor health services. In Latin America, complications from illegal abortions are the leading cause of death for women between the ages of fifteen and thirty-nine.⁵

Sex discrimination kills women daily. When combined with race, class, and other forms of oppression, it constitutes a deadly denial of women's rights to life and liberty on a large scale throughout the world. The most pervasive violation of females is violence against women in all its manifestations, from wife battery, incest, and rape, to dowry deaths⁶, genital mutilation⁷, and female sexual slavery. These abuses occur in every country and are found in the home and in the workplace, on streets, campuses, and in prisons and refugee camps. They cross class, race, age, and national lines; and at the same time, the forms this violence takes often reinforce other oppressions such as racism, "able-bodyism," and imperialism. Case in point: in order to feed their families, poor women in brothels around U.S. military bases in places like the Philippines bear the burden of sexual, racial, and national imperialism in repeated and often brutal violation of their bodies.

Even a short review of random statistics reveals that the extent of violence against women globally is staggering:

- In the United States, battery is the leading cause of injury to adult women, and a rape is committed every six minutes.⁸
- In Peru 70 percent of all crimes reported to police involve women who are beaten by their partners; and in Lima (a city of seven million people), 168,970 rapes were reported in 1987 alone.⁹
- In India, eight out of ten wives are victims of violence, either domestic battery, dowry-related abuse, or among the least fortunate, murder.¹⁰
- In France, a very high percentage of the victims of violence are women; 51 percent at the hands of a spouse or lover. Similar statistics from places as diverse as Bangladesh, Canada, Kenya, and Thailand demonstrate that more than 50 percent of female homicides were committed by family members.¹¹

Where recorded, domestic battery figures range from 40 percent to 80 percent of women beaten, usually repeatedly, indicating that the home is the most dangerous place for women and frequently the site of cruelty and torture. As the Carol Stuart murder in Boston in 1989 demonstrated, sexist and racist attitudes in the United States often cover up the real threat to women; a woman is murdered in Massachusetts by a husband or lover every 22 days.¹²

Such numbers do not reflect the full extent of the problem of violence against women, much of which remains hidden. Yet rather than receiving recognition as a major world conflict, this violence is accepted as normal or even dismissed as an individual or cultural matter. Georgina Ashworth notes that:

*The greatest restriction of liberty, dignity and movement, and at the same time, direct violation of the person is the threat and realisation of violence... However violence against the female sex, on a scale which far exceeds the list of Amnesty International victims, is tolerated publicly; indeed some acts of violation are not crimes in law, others are legitimized in custom or court opinion, and most are blamed on the victims themselves.*¹³

Violence against women is a touchstone that illustrates the limited concept of human rights and highlights the political nature of the abuse of women. As Lori Heise states: "this is not random violence.... the risk factor is being female."¹⁴ Victims are chosen because of their gender. The message is domination: stay in your place or be afraid. Contrary to the argument that such violence is only personal or cultural, it is profoundly political. It results from the structural relationships of power, domination and privilege between men and women in society. Violence against women is central to maintaining those political relations at home, at work, and in all public spheres.

Failure to see the oppression of women as political also results in the exclusion of sex discrimination and violence against women from the human rights agenda. Female subordination runs so deep that it is still viewed as inevitable or natural, rather than seen as a politically constructed reality maintained by patriarchal interests, ideology, and institutions. But I do not believe that male violation of women is inevitable or natural. Such a belief requires a narrow and pessimistic view of men. If violence and domination are understood as a politically constructed reality, it is possible to imagine deconstructing that system and building more just interactions between the sexes.

The physical territory of this political struggle over what constitutes women's human rights is women's bodies. The importance of control over women can be seen in the intensity of resistance to laws and social changes that put control of women's bodies in women's hands: reproductive rights, freedom of sexuality whether heterosexual or lesbian, laws that criminalize rape in marriage, etc. Denial of reproductive rights and homophobia are also political means of maintaining control over women and perpetuating sex roles and power which have human rights implications. The physical abuse of women is a reminder of this territorial domination and is sometimes accompanied by other forms of human rights abuse such as slavery (forced prostitution), sexual terrorism (rape), imprisonment (confinement to the home) or torture (systematic battery). Some cases are extreme, such as the women in Thailand who died in a brothel fire because they were chained to their beds. Most situations are more ordinary like denying women decent education or jobs which leaves them prey to abusive marriages, exploitative work, and prostitution.

This raises once again the question of the state's responsibility for protecting women's human rights. Feminists have shown how the distinction between private and public abuse is a dichotomy often used to justify female subordination in the home. Governments regulate many matters in the family and individual spheres. For example, human rights activists pressure states to prevent slavery or racial discrimination and segregation even when these are conducted by nongovernmental forces in private, or proclaimed as cultural traditions, as they have been in both the southern United States and in South Africa. The real questions are: (1) who decides what are legitimate human rights and, (2) when should the state become involved and for what purposes. Riane Eisler argues that:

The issue is what types of private acts are and are not protected by the right to privacy and/or the principle of family autonomy. Even more specifically, the issue is whether violations of human rights within the family such as genital mutilation, wife beating, and other forms of violence designed to maintain patriarchal control should be within the purview of human rights theory and action...[T]he underlying problem for human rights theory, as for most other fields of theory, is that the yardstick that has been developed for defining and measuring human rights has been based on the male as norm.¹⁵

The human rights community must move beyond its male defined norms in order to respond to the brutal and systematic violation of women globally. This does not mean that every human rights group must alter the focus of its work. However it does require examining patriarchal biases and acknowledging the rights of women as human rights. Governments must seek to end the politically and culturally constructed war on women rather than continue to perpetuate it. Every state has the responsibility to intervene in the abuse of women's rights within its borders and to end its collusion with the forces that perpetrate such violations in other countries.

II. TOWARD ACTION: PRACTICAL APPROACHES

The classification of human rights is more than just a semantics problem because it has practical policy consequences. Human rights are still considered to be more important than women's rights. The distinction perpetuates the idea that the rights of women are of a lesser order than the "rights of man," and as Eisler describes it, "serves to justify practices that do not accord women full and equal status."¹⁶ In the United Nations, the Human Rights Commission has more power to hear and investigate cases than the Commission on the Status of Women, more staff and budget, and better mechanisms for implementing its findings. Thus it makes a difference in what can be done if a case is deemed a violation of women's rights and not of human rights.¹⁷

The determination of refugee status illustrates how the definition of human rights affects people's lives. The Dutch Refugee Association, in its pioneering efforts to convince nations to recognize sexual persecution and violence against women as justifications for granting refugee status, found that some European governments would take sexual persecution into account as an aspect of other forms of political repression, but none would make it the grounds for refugee status per se.¹⁸ The implications of such a distinction are clear when examining a situation like that of some Bangladeshi women, who having been raped during the Pakistan-Bangladesh war, subsequently faced death at the hands of male relatives to preserve "family honor." Western powers professed outrage but did not offer asylum to these victims of human rights abuse.

I have observed four basic approaches to linking women's rights to human rights. These approaches are presented separately here in order to identify each more clearly. In practice, these approaches often overlap, and while each raises questions about the others, I see them as complementary. These approaches can be applied to many issues, but I will illustrate them primarily in terms of how they address violence against women in order to show the implications of their differences on a concrete issue

1. Women's Rights as Political and Civil Rights. Taking women's specific needs into consideration as part of the already recognized "first generation" human rights of political and civil liberties is the first approach. This involves both enhancing the visibility of women who suffer general human rights violations as well as calling attention to particular abuses women encounter because they are female. Thus, issues of violence against women are raised when they connect to other forms of violation such as the sexual torture of women political prisoners in South America.¹⁹ Groups like the Women's Task Force of Amnesty International have taken this approach in pushing for Amnesty to launch a campaign on behalf of women political prisoners which would address the sexual abuse and rape of women in custody, their lack of maternal care in detention, and the resulting human rights abuse of their children.

Documenting the problems of women refugees and developing responsive policies are other illustrations of this approach. Women and children make up more than 80 percent of those in refugee camps, yet few refugee policies are specifically shaped to meet the needs of these vulnerable populations who face considerable sexual abuse. For example, in one camp where men were allocated the community's rations, some gave food to women and their children in exchange for sex. Revealing this abuse led to new policies that allocated food directly to the women.²⁰

The political and civil rights approach is a useful starting point for many human rights groups; by considering women's experiences, these groups can expand their efforts in areas where they are already working. This approach also raises contradictions that reveal the limits of a narrow civil liberties view. One contradiction is to define rape as a human rights abuse only when it occurs in state custody but not on the streets or in the home. Another is to say that a violation of the right to free speech occurs when someone is jailed for defending gay rights, but not when someone is jailed or even tortured and killed for homosexuality. Thus while this approach of adding women and stirring them into existing first generation human rights categories is useful, it is not enough by itself.

2. Women's Rights as Socioeconomic Rights. The second approach includes the particular plight of women with regard to the so-called "second generation" human rights such as rights to food, shelter, health care, and employment. This is an approach favored by those who see the dominant Western human rights tradition and international law as too individualistic and identify women's oppression as primarily economic.

This tendency has its origins among socialists and labor activists who have long argued that political human rights are meaningless to many without economic rights as well. It focuses on the primacy of the need to end women's economic subordination as the key to other issues including women's vulnerability to violence. This particular focus has led to work on issues like women's right to organize as workers, and opposition to violence in the workplace, especially in situations like the free trade zones which have targeted women as cheap, nonorganized labor. Another focus of this approach has been highlighting the feminization of poverty, or what might better be called the increasing impoverishment of females. Poverty has not become strictly female, but females now comprise a higher percentage of the poor.

Looking at women's rights in the context of socioeconomic development is another example of this approach. Third world peoples have called for an understanding of socioeconomic development as a human rights issue.²¹ Within this demand, some have sought to integrate women into development and have examined women's specific needs in relation to areas like land ownership or access to credit. Among those working on women in development, there is growing interest in violence against women as both a health and development issue. If violence is seen as having negative consequences for social productivity, it may get more attention. This type of narrow economic measure, however, should not determine whether such violence is seen as a human rights concern. Violence as a development issue is linked to the need to understand development not just as an economic issue but also as a question of empowerment and human growth.

One of the limitations of this second approach has been its tendency to reduce women's needs to the economic sphere, which implies that women's rights will follow automatically with third world development, or socialism. This has not proven to be the case. Many working from this approach are no longer trying to add women into either the Western capitalist or socialist development models, but rather seek a transformative development process that links women's political, economic and cultural empowerment.

3. Women's Rights and the Law. The creation of new legal mechanisms to counter sex discrimination characterizes the third approach to women's rights as human rights. These efforts seek to make existing legal and political institutions work for women and to expand the state's responsibility for the violation of women's human rights. National and local laws which address sex discrimination and violence against women are examples of this approach. These measures allow women to fight for their rights within the legal system. The primary international illustration is the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women.²²

The Convention has been described as "essentially an international bill of rights for women and a framework for women's participation in the development process . . . (which) spells out internationally accepted principles and standards for achieving equality between women and men."²³ Adopted by the UN General Assembly in 1979, the Convention has been ratified or acceded to by 104 countries as of January, 1990. In theory these countries are obligated to pursue policies in accordance with it and to report on their compliance to the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination Against Women (CEDAW).

While the Convention addresses many issues of sex discrimination, one of its shortcomings is failure to directly address the question of violence against women. CEDAW passed a resolution at its eighth Session in Vienna in 1989 expressing concern that this issue be on its agenda and instructing states to include in their periodic reports information about statistics, legislation, and support services in this area.²⁴ The Commonwealth Secretariat in its manual on the reporting process for the Convention also interprets the issue of violence against women as "clearly fundamental to the spirit of the Convention," especially in Article 5 which calls for the modification of social and cultural patterns, sex roles and stereotyping, that are based on the idea of the inferiority or the superiority of either sex.²⁵

The Convention outlines a clear human rights agenda for women which, if accepted by governments, would mark an enormous step forward. It also carries the limitations of all such international documents in that there is little power to demand its implementation. Within the United Nations, it is not generally regarded as a convention with teeth, as illustrated by the difficulty that CEDAW has had in getting countries to report on compliance with its provisions. Further, it is still treated by governments and most nongovernmental organizations as a document dealing with women's (read "secondary") rights, not human rights. Nevertheless, it is a useful statement of principles endorsed by the United Nations around which women can organize to achieve legal and political change in their regions.

4. Feminist Transformation of Human Rights. Transforming the human rights concept from a feminist perspective, so that it will take greater account of women's lives, is the fourth approach. This approach raises the question of how women's rights relate to human rights by first looking at the violations of women's lives and asking how the human rights concept can be changed to be more responsive to women. For example, the GABRIELA women's coalition in the Philippines simply stated that "Women's Rights are Human Rights" in launching a campaign last year. As Ninotchka Rosca explained, coalition members saw that "human rights are not reducible to a question of legal and due process. . . . In the case of women, human rights are affected by the entire society's traditional perception of what is proper or not proper for women." Similarly a panel at the 1990 International Women's Rights Action Watch conference asserted that "Violence Against Women is a Human Rights Issue." While work in the three previous approaches is often done from a feminist perspective, this last view is the most distinctly feminist with its woman-centered stance and its refusal to wait for permission from some authority to determine what is or is not a human rights issue.

This transformative approach can be taken toward any issue, but those working from this approach have tended to focus most on abuses that arise specifically out of gender, such as reproductive rights, female sexual slavery, violence against women and "family crimes" like forced marriage, compulsory heterosexuality, and female mutilation. These are also the issues most often dismissed as not really human rights questions. This is therefore the most hotly contested area and requires that barriers be broken down between public and private, state and non-governmental responsibilities.

Those working to transform the human rights vision from this perspective can draw on the work of others who have expanded the understanding of human rights previously. For example, two decades ago there was no concept of "disappearances" as a human rights abuse. However, the women of the Plaza de Mayo in Argentina did not wait for an official declaration but stood up to demand state accountability for these crimes. In so doing, they helped to create a context for expanding the concept of responsibility for deaths at the hands of paramilitary or right-wing death squads which, even if not carried out by the state, were allowed to happen. Another example in the United States is the developing concept that civil rights violations include "hate crimes," violence that is racially motivated or directed against homosexuals, Jews, or other minority groups. Many accept that states have an obligation to work to prevent such human rights abuses, and getting violence against women seen as a hate crime is being pursued by some.

The practical applications of transforming the human rights concept from feminist perspectives need to be explored further. The danger in pursuing only this approach is the tendency to become isolated from and competitive with other human rights groups because they have been so reluctant to address gender violence and discrimination. Yet, most women experience abuse on the grounds of sex, race, class, nation, age, sexual preference, politics, etc. as interrelated, and little benefit comes from separating them as competing claims. The human rights community need not abandon other issues but should incorporate gender perspectives into them and see how these expand the terms of their work. By recognizing issues like violence against women as human rights concerns, human rights scholars and activists do not have to take these up as their primary tasks. However they do have to stop gate-keeping and guarding their prerogative to determine what is considered a "legitimate" human rights issue.

As mentioned before, these four approaches are overlapping and many strategies for change involve elements of more than one. All of these approaches contain aspects of what is necessary to achieve women's rights. At a time when dualist ways of thinking and views of competing economic systems are in question, the creative task is to look for ways to connect these approaches and to see how we can go beyond exclusive views of what people need in their lives. In the words of an early feminist group, we need bread and roses too. Women want food and liberty and the possibility of living lives of dignity free from domination and violence. In this struggle, the recognition of women's rights as human rights can play an important role.

ENDNOTES

1. Universal Declaration of Human Rights, adopted 10 December 1948, G.A. Res. 217A(III), U.N. Doc. A/810 (1948).
2. Blanche Wiesen Cook, "Eleanor Roosevelt and Human Rights: The Battle for Peace and Planetary Decency," Edward P. Crapol, ed. Women and American Foreign Policy: Lobbyists, Critics, and Insiders (New York: Greenwood Press, 1987), 98-118; Georgina Ashworth, "Of Violence and Violation: Women and Human Rights," Change Thinkbook II (London, 1986).
3. Vibhuti Patel, In Search of Our Bodies: A Feminist Look at Women, Health and Reproduction in India (Bombay: Shakti, 1987); Lori Heise, "International Dimensions of Violence Against Women," Response, vol. 12, no. 1 (1989) : 3.
4. Sundari Ravindran, Health Implications of Sex Discrimination in Childhood (Geneva: World Health Organization, 1986). These problems and proposed social programs to counter them in India are discussed in detail in "Gender Violence: Gender Discrimination Between Boy and Girl in Parental Family," paper published by CHETNA (Child Health Education Training and Nutrition Awareness), Ahmedabad, 1989.
5. Debbie Taylor, ed. Women: A World Report, A New Internationalist Book (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1985), 10. See Joni Seager and Ann Olson, eds., Women in the World: An International Atlas (London: Pluto Press, 1986) for more statistics on the effects of sex discrimination.
6. Sometimes a husband will disguise the murder of a bride as suicide or an accident in order to collect the marriage settlement paid to him by the bride's parents. Although dowry is now illegal in many countries, official records for 1987 showed 1,786 dowry deaths in India alone. See Heise, note 3 above, 5.
7. For an in-depth examination of the practice of female circumcision see Alison T. Slack, "Female Circumcision: A Critical Appraisal," Human Rights Quarterly 10 (1988): 439.
8. Everett Koop, M.D., "Violence Against Women: A Global Problem," Presentation by the Surgeon General of the U.S., Public Health Service, Washington D.C., 1989.
9. Ana Maria Portugal, "Cronica de Una Violacion Provocada?," Fempres especial "Contraviolencia," Santiago, 1988; Seager and Olson, note 5 above, 37; Heise, Note 3 above.
10. Ashworth, note 2 above, 9.
11. "Violence Against Women in the Family," Centre for Social Development and Humanitarian Affairs, United Nations Office at Vienna, 1989.
12. Bella English, "Stereotypes Led Us Astray," The Boston Globe, January 5, 1990, 17, col. 3. See also statistics in Women's International Network News, 1989; United Nations Vienna, note 11 above; Ashworth, note 2 above; Heise, note 3 above; and Fempres, note 9 above.
13. Ashworth, note 2 above, 8.
14. Heise, note 3 above, 3.

15. Riane Eisler, "Human Rights: Toward an Integrated Theory for Action," Human Rights Quarterly, 9 (1987): 297. See also Alida Brill, Nobody's Business: The Paradoxes of Privacy (New York: Addison-Wesley, 1990).
16. Eisler, note 15 above, 29.
17. Sandra Coliver, "United Nations Machinery on Women's Rights: How Might They Better Help Women Whose Rights Are Being Violated?" in Ellen L. Lutz, Hurst Hannum, and Kathryn J. Burke, eds., New Directions in Human Rights, (Philadelphia: Univ. of Penn. Press, 1989).
18. Marijke Meyer, "Oppression of Women and Refugee Status," unpublished report to NGO Forum, Nairobi, Kenya, 1985 and "Sexual Violence Against Women Refugees," Ministry of Social Affairs and Labour, The Netherlands, June 1984.
19. Ximena Bunster describes this in Chile and Argentina in "The Torture of Women Political Prisoners: A Case Study in Female Sexual Slavery," in Kathleen Barry, Charlotte Bunch, and Shirley Castley, eds., International Feminism: Networking Against Female Sexual Slavery (New York: IWTC, 1984).
20. Report given by Margaret Groarke at Women's Panel, Amnesty International New York Regional Meeting, February 24, 1990.
21. Feminist discourse on human rights can draw on third world perspectives on human rights that are often not well known in the West, such as those found in: Philip Alston (editor), International Aspects of Human Rights (UNESCO, Paris, 1984); Smitu Kothari and Seithi Harsh (editors), Rethinking Human Rights (Lokayan, Delhi, 1989); Jose Zalaquett, The Human Rights Issue and the Human Rights Movement (World Council of Churches, Geneva, 1981); and articles in many publications such as the Asian Newsletter on Human Rights and the Boston College Third World Law Journal. Rebecca J. Cook lists many sources on women and human rights internationally in "Bibliography: the International Rights to Nondiscrimination on the Basis of Sex," Yale Journal of International Law, 14:161, 1989.
22. Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women, G.A. Res. 34/180, U.N. Doc. A/Res/34/180 (1980).
23. "The Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women," Summary of CEDAW prepared by the International Women's Rights Action Watch, Humphrey Institute of Public Affairs, Minneapolis, 1988.
24. CEDAW Newsletter, 3rd Issue (13 April 1989), 2 (summary of U.N. Report on the Eighth Session, U.N. Doc. A/44/38, 14 April 1989).
25. "The Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women: The Reporting Process - A Manual for Commonwealth Jurisdictions," Commonwealth Secretariat, London, 1989.
26. Speech given by Ninotchka Rosca at Amnesty International New York Regional Conference," 24 February, 1990, 2.

This article was first published in HUMAN RIGHTS QUARTERLY, Vol. 12, No. 4, Nov., 1990, pp. 486-498 and in WOMEN'S HEALTH JOURNAL, ISIS INTERNATIONAL, No. 19, 1990, pp. 4-12.

ROXANNA CARRILLO

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN: AN OBSTACLE TO DEVELOPMENT¹

Human development is a process of enlarging people's choices. The most critical of these wide-ranging choices are to live a long and healthy life, to be educated and to have access to resources needed for a decent standard of living. Additional choices include political freedom, guaranteed human rights and personal self-respect. Development enables people to have these choices.

Human Development Report, 1990

I. INTRODUCTION

A new vision of international economic and social development is eloquently elaborated by the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) in its Human Development Reports, published each year since 1990. These reports focus on the human aspects of development as an indication of whether the goals of development are being achieved. This concept questions the approach of the three previous UN Development Decades which measured development only through statistical indicators such as growth and national income. The human development approach expands the use of indicators by looking at how they impact on the lives of women and men. These broad indicators include: nutrition and health services; access to knowledge, secure livelihoods and decent working conditions; security against crime and physical violence; satisfying leisure time; participation in the economic, cultural, and political activities of their communities; access to basic services; and control over the necessities of life. From this perspective, the goal of development is to create an enabling environment for people to enjoy long, healthy, and creative lives.

The United Nations Decade for Women (1976–1985) helped to focus attention on the critical importance of women's activities for economic and social development. However, after fifteen years of efforts to integrate women into development, there is a growing body of evidence indicating that women are still only marginal participants in and beneficiaries of development programmes and policy goals. Women remain in a disadvantaged position in employment, education, health, and government.

In spite of the slow process of change, the UN Decade and women in development efforts in general have been successful in identifying problems critical to women's participation that were not previously understood as development issues. One such area that has emerged is violence against women. Violence against women has previously been seen — when seen at all, and often it is totally invisible — as a private matter, a cultural and family issue, or at best, pertinent to social welfare policies. Within the United Nations, violence against women has been discussed in relation to peace, and there are increasing efforts to include it in the human rights agenda. These approaches underscore the multiple aspects of such violence but they do not cover the totality of the picture. There are still large gaps in our knowledge of the dimensions and effects of violence against women on the development process itself. Lack of statistical data is one of several problems in seeking to map the dimensions of this issue. Nonetheless, we have reached a point where we can begin to understand how violence as a form of control affects women's participation in the development process.

The emergence of violence as a crucial issue for women and development in the Third World has arisen from grassroots women's endeavours rather than being initiated by outside authorities or international agencies. Violence is increasingly identified as a priority concern among various regions of the world, and/or as a problem that limits women's participation in or capacity to benefit from development projects. Women have taken leadership in making violence against themselves visible, and in addressing its causes and manifestations, as well as its remedies. From the Uganda Association of Women Lawyers, to the Asia and Pacific Women, Law and Development Network, the Trinidad Rape Crisis Centre, the Inter-American Commission of Women and the Fiji Women's Rights Movement, women's leadership in the developing world is struggling to include issues of violence against women on national agendas, and to demonstrate the ways in which such violence blocks development. Gender violence, whether in its most overt and brutal or more subtle forms, is a constant in women's lives. In Latin America, where ISIS International has identified 109 women's projects dealing with various aspects of the problem,² women's movements have institutionalized November 25th as a day to denounce and call for action against violence towards women. Similar initiatives have been taken in many other parts of the world.

In a 1988 global survey of women's groups in developing countries, MATCH International, a Canadian NGO devoted to issues of women and development, found that violence against women was the most frequent concern raised. Women's groups identified the impact of such violence on development in concrete terms, leading MATCH to conclude:

Violent acts against women, the world over, attack their dignity as human beings and leave them vulnerable and fearful. Conditioned to undervalue their skills and abilities and paralyzed by real fears of violence and retribution, women are marginalized in society and forced out of the decision making processes which shape and determine the development of their communities... Violence against women is not limited to any one country. The acts range from battering, incest, assault, and rape worldwide to female circumcision in Africa, dowry deaths in India, and militarization in the Philippines. Along this continuum one must also include the limited employment opportunities for women, the lack of access to education, women's social isolation and the sexual harassment that women experience daily. The manifestations of violence against women simply alter their forms according to the social, economic, and historical realities in which they occur.³

II. PUTTING GENDER VIOLENCE ON THE DEVELOPMENT AGENDA

Violence against women is not a problem that affects only the poor or only women in the Third World; it affects women worldwide of all races and income groups. Yet, it is rarely documented. In the industrialized world, few countries have embarked on empirical studies that could provide us with a solid mass of information aimed at discovering the real dimensions of the problem. In the developing world, with very few exceptions such as Papua New Guinea, statistics are scarcer still. However, the seriousness of the problem should not be underestimated. When statistics are available, they document powerfully and make visible the pervasiveness and extent of violence against women.

What the Numbers Reveal

Substantial official statistics and survey data in the United States make vivid the burden of violence against women. A rape occurs every 6 minutes and domestic battery is the single most significant cause of injury to women, more than car accidents, rapes and muggings combined.⁴ Violence occurs at least once in two-thirds of all marriages,⁵ one in eight couples admit there has been an act of violence between them which caused serious injury.⁶ Half of all wives will experience some form of spouse-inflicted violence during their marriage, regardless of race or socio-economic status⁷ and many suicide attempts by women are as a result of repeated battery.⁸

Three different studies showed consistently that women were battered even when pregnant. Numbers ranged from 25 percent to 62 percent of those surveyed in battered women's shelters. Police report that between 40 percent and 60 percent of the calls they receive, especially on the night shift, are domestic disputes. A study done twenty years ago in Kansas City showed that the police had been called previously at least five times in the two years preceding 50 percent of all homicides by a spouse. In Cleveland, Ohio, during a 9-month period, police received approximately 15,000 domestic violence calls, but reports were filed for only 700 of them and arrests were made in just 460 cases.⁹

Statistics from other industrialized countries are equally upsetting. Reports from France indicate that 95 percent of its victims of violence are women, 51 percent of these at the hands of their husbands. In Denmark, 25 percent of women cite violence as the reason for divorce, and a 1984 study of urban victimization in seven major Canadian cities found that 90 percent of victims were women. One in four women in Canada can expect to be sexually assaulted at some point in their lives, one half of these before the age of seventeen.¹⁰

United Nations documents also refer to the extent of violence in the family. A three year study of violence against women in Austria commissioned by the Division for the Advancement of Women discovered a high level of wife abuse as did official statistics from Poland. An historical analysis of murders at the end of the nineteenth century in England and Wales showed that about 50 percent of the victims were murdered by their husbands, lovers or boyfriends. The comparison with official figures in the United Kingdom today shows that this pattern has not changed.¹¹

Examining the extent of violence against women globally yields an appreciation of the magnitude of what it costs to the development process. Even though statistics on the extent of the problem are incomplete, the little that is known about violence in developing countries is disturbing.

The newly established Servicio Nacional de la Mujer in Chile has chosen as one of its programme priorities the prevention of intrafamily violence. According to a survey they did in Santiago, 80 percent of the women acknowledged being victims of violence in their homes. The Mexican Federation of Women Trade Unions reports that 95 percent of women workers are victims of sexual harassment, and complains that the impunity of these crimes limits women's participation in the work force. A national survey on domestic violence undertaken by the Papua New Guinea Law Reform Commission showed that an average of two-thirds of rural wives in that country have experienced marital violence.¹²

A Report of the Asian Women's Research and Action Network (AWRAN) indicates that: in Korea over two thirds of the women are beaten periodically by their husbands¹³; while in Nicaragua 44 percent of the men admit having beaten their wives or girlfriends frequently¹⁴; and a Thai report found at least 50 percent of all married women are beaten on a regular basis. In a study of child prostitution in Cochabamba, Bolivia, 79 percent of the girls said they became prostitutes because of economic need when they ran away from violent homes where they were victims of incest and rape by male relatives.¹⁵ In India crimes against women are "an increasing trend in the last decade," while the rate of conviction has declined. Meanwhile, the female suicide rate in that country doubled from 1987 to 1988. A newspaper survey in Pakistan revealed that 99 percent of housewives and 77 percent of working women were beaten by their husbands and listed the following types of violence committed against women: murder (including being kicked to death or burnt), beatings, abduction, selling of women, sexual harassment or rape.¹⁶ Other reports¹⁷ also found a high incidence of family violence in countries as different as Bangladesh, Colombia, Kenya, Kuwait, Nigeria, Vanuatu, and Uganda.

Violence against women not only maims and debilitates women, femicide, the death of women from gender violence, kills them on a large scale from pre-birth onward. Amartya Sen has pointed out the deadly cost of social and economic inequalities between men and women by analyzing the sex ratio (female to male) in the less developed countries. Whereas there are 106 women per 100 men in Europe and North America, there are only 97 women per 100 men in the less developed countries as a whole. In some areas, noticeably Asia, and especially India and China, when one applies the sex ratio of Africa (1.02), which comes closer to that of Europe and North America (1.06), the equation yields chilling results. Given the number of men in those two countries, there should be about 30 million more women in India, and 38 million more in China. Some of these missing females disappeared through gender violence ranging from female foeticide to selective malnourishment and starvation of girls, neglect of health problems, dowry deaths and various other forms of violence. Sen reminds us that "since mortality and survival are not independent of care and neglect, and are influenced by social action and public policy" development clearly must take more account of women's needs in this area.¹⁸

Although some of its manifestations are culturally specific, violence against women cuts across national boundaries, ideologies, classes, races and ethnic groups. In that regard it is not a region specific problem. Nevertheless, the forms of violence often are culturally determined and specific programmes to counter these must be developed both at the local and national levels.

The International Debate

The United Nations began to recognize the problem of violence against women within the context of the UN Decade for Women. At all three World Conferences on Women—Mexico City (1975), Copenhagen (1980) and Nairobi (1985)—and at the parallel non-governmental fora, those working to raise the issues of violence against women demanded special attention to the constraints it places on women's full participation in society. The official documents produced at these events are powerful indictments of the discrimination that women face in all countries, regions and cultures, and provide a useful foundation for a different understanding of gender related violence. The documents culminated in the Nairobi Forward-Looking Strategies for *the Advancement of Women*¹⁹ which established the concerns of the international community, and acknowledged the responsibility of governments and all members of society to eradicate violence. These strategies are the building blocks for framing new strategies and policies to address the violence issue.

The Forward-Looking Strategies for the Advancement of Women remains the strongest UN document on violence against women in relation to development goals. It includes Resolution 258 which calls for the creation of preventive policies and institutionalized means of assistance to women victims of the various forms of violence experienced in everyday life in all societies. This resolution acknowledges that “women are beaten, mutilated, burned, sexually abused, and raped” and that such violence is “a major obstacle to the achievement of the objectives of the Decade and should be given special attention.”

The same document insists on the special training of law enforcement officials for dealing with women victims of violent crimes; urges legislation to end the degradation of women through sex-related crimes; stresses the promotion of female human rights, specifically in relation to issues of domestic violence and violence against women; insists on favouring a preventive approach that includes institutionalized economic and other forms of assistance; and, suggests the establishment of national machineries to deal with the question of domestic violence. In addition to assistance to victims of violence against women in the family and in society, it demands that:

*Governments should undertake to increase public awareness of violence against women as a societal problem, establish policies and legislative measures to ascertain its causes and prevent and eliminate such violence, in particular by suppressing degrading images and representations of women in society, and finally encourage the development of educational and re-educational measures for offenders.*²⁰

Other UN bodies such as the Economic and Social Council, also address the issue. The Report of the UN Secretary General at the 32nd Session of the Commission on the Status of Women stated that violence against women, defined as “physical, sexual, emotional, and economic abuse within the family; rape and sexual assault; sexual harassment and trafficking in women; involuntary prostitution; and pornography” all share a common denominator: “the use of coercion to make women do things against their will.” Following the Council’s request for more research on the topic, the Division for the Advancement of Women in Vienna called for an “Expert Group Meeting on Violence in the Family, with Special Emphasis on its Effects on Women." The experts met in 1986, and produced a publication, Violence Against Women in the Family, which gives a thorough review of the literature about violence against women within the family unit.²¹

However, while UN recognition of the issue of violence against women as a problem for society as a whole is slowly growing, the linkage between violence and development is often ignored. The challenge which concerned agencies such as the United Nations Development Fund for Women (UNIFEM) face is that of putting violence against women on the development agenda, and showing the connections between the two.

In spite of significant progress towards human development made by countries of the South in relation to the North, particularly in relation to life expectancy, education and health, one has to look carefully at the breakdown of statistics by gender. To examine these indicators from a cross-cultural gender perspective is enlightening: nowhere do females enjoy the same standards as males, and in some areas, gaps have widened so considerably that one must question whether development attempts inevitably result in disadvantages for women. As the 1990 Human Development Report states:

*In most societies, women fare less well than men. As children they have less access to education and sometimes to food and health care. As adults they receive less education and training, work longer hours for lower incomes and have few property rights or none.*²²

Looking at gender and development from a human centered approach remains difficult because so few statistics are disaggregated according to gender. Nevertheless, the 1990 Human Development Report suggests a more comprehensive understanding of development as "a process of enlarging people's choices." It is clear that much needs to be done to increase women's life options. Fundamental to achieving development for women must be increasing their self confidence and their ability to participate in all aspects of society. Violence against women is in direct contradiction to these development goals. It disrupts women's lives and denies them options. It undermines women's confidence and sense of self-esteem at every level, physically and psychologically; and it destroys women's health, denies their human rights, and undermines their full participation in society. Where domestic violence keeps a woman from participating in a development project, force is used to deprive her of earnings, or fear of sexual assault prevents her from taking a job or attending a public function, development does not occur.

Violence against women is an obstacle to the achievement of development goals in a variety of ways. First, it hinders the human development of women themselves. Women experience violence as a form of control that limits their ability to pursue options in almost every area of life from the home to schools, workplaces, and most public spaces. For example, case studies of victims of domestic violence in Peru²³ and of garment workers in the Mexican maquilas²⁴ showed men beat their wives frequently while demanding the income that the women had earned. Indonesian female workers returning to their villages complain of their helplessness in the face of harassment and sexual abuse.²⁵

Violence against women results in all types of physical injury from cuts and bruises to broken bones and from brain damage to homicide. Women suffer also the psychological effects of violence. The repetition of a pattern of aggression can turn a woman into a fearful and confused person, who lacks confidence, experiences feelings of helplessness, and has difficulty making decisions on her own. Her work performance suffers, she is frequently absent and may risk losing her job. In the worst cases, a woman may find her situation so intolerable, she turns that aggression against herself and commits suicide.

III. GENDER VIOLENCE AS AN OBSTACLE TO DEVELOPMENT

The socially constructed dependency of women on men is key to understanding women's vulnerability to violence. This dependency is frequently economic, and is the result of various layers of discrimination. Much of women's work is unpaid labor at home and in the fields which is not valued by society nor calculated as part of the GNP or productive work of a nation. Those women who work in paid jobs often work longer hours in lower status at badly paid jobs, with fewer benefits and less security than men.

Female dependency extends to other areas—psychological, social and cultural. Women are trained to believe that their value is attached to the men in their lives—fathers, brothers, husbands, and sons—and often they are socially ostracized if they displease or disobey them. Women are educated to view their own self esteem as linked to the ability to satisfy the needs and desires of others, and thus, see themselves as inadequate or bad if men beat them. This socialization process is reinforced by cultures where a woman is constantly diminished, her sexuality rendered a commodity, her work and characteristics devalued, her identity shaped by an environment that reduces her to her most biological functions, and yet, where she is still blamed for "causing" or deserving the abuse of men.

Women's socio-economic and psychological dependency makes it difficult for them to leave situations of domestic violence or sexual harassment. Often in rural settings it is physically impossible for women to leave as they literally have no place to go or the means to get away, and there are no services available to them. A Commonwealth Secretariat report on domestic violence cites the opinion of experts that a shelter or other safe refuge alternative is only possible in a city of at least 10,000 inhabitants.²⁶

In urban settings, where it may be easier for women to leave abusive relationships, there is often nowhere to go. This is well illustrated by the links between domestic violence and homelessness. For example, a shelter for homeless women in Boston reports that about 90 percent of its occupants are victims of domestic violence, and New York City shelter workers note a similar trend.²⁷ One authoritative report cites the lack of alternative housing as one of the reasons women stay in or return to violent marriages.²⁸ Further, violence itself makes women become even more dependent; studies from several countries find that escalation of violence undermines women's self esteem and their capacity to take action diminishes.

Violence against women also affects the development and well being of children and families. A recent study on children of battered women in Canada reports post-traumatic stress, clinical dysfunction, behavioral and emotional disorders in children from violent homes.²⁹ Some argue that children's socialization into accepting or committing violence starts at home when they witness their father beating their mother or when they are themselves abused. A film on wife battering in Papua New Guinea portrays the son of the family having difficulties in school because he is worried about an incident he witnessed in which his mother was beaten.³⁰

It is becoming increasingly clear that the best way to reduce infant mortality is through the education of women.³¹ The 1990 Human Development Report underlines the high social dividend that comes with female literacy, as demonstrated by lower infant mortality rates, better family nutrition, reduced fertility and lower population growth. Improving women's self confidence through education and by diminishing violence is therefore an investment that can have long lasting effects on children and the future of a nation.

Violence against women is highly destructive to families and, as the study carried out by the Law Reform Commission of Papua New Guinea suggests, it can often affect a husband negatively in the long run: he may be injured or even killed if the wife retaliates, he loses the love and respect of his wife and children, and he might lose his family altogether. In Papua New Guinea, as in many countries, battery is one of the main reasons women give when filing for divorce.³²

Health usually is recognized as an important development issue. One of the clearest facts about violence against women is that it is detrimental to women's physical and mental health, including women's very survival. A report by the Surgeon General of the United States claims that battered women are four to five times more likely than non-battered women to require psychiatric treatment, and more likely to commit suicide. Further, each year, some one million women in the U.S. are sufficiently injured to seek medical assistance at emergency rooms from injuries sustained through battering. These injuries include bruises, concussions, broken noses, teeth, ribs and limbs, throat injuries, lacerations and stab wounds, burns and bites; injuries caused by being struck by fists and blunt objects as well as knives, kicks, strangulations, being thrown down stairs and more. The report refers to this as "an overwhelming moral, economic, and public health burden that our society can no longer bear," and which demands a major response from governments at the national, state and community levels, legislators and city councils, police, prosecutors, judges, probation officers, health professions, educational institutions, the communications media, the church and clergy, non-governmental organizations, and [especially from] "international organizations that must demonstrate a clear recognition of the problem and provide the necessary leadership to us all."³³

The AIDS crisis has cast unequal gender relations in a new light. In Africa, a continent where the AIDS epidemic has reached staggering numbers, women are experiencing the effects of male control in multiple deadly ways. A report of the Health Ministry of Uganda reveals that there are twice as many cases of AIDS among girls between 15 and 19 years old as among boys of the same age group. These numbers reflect a common belief among men that they will have fewer possibilities of being exposed to the AIDS virus if they engage in sexual intercourse with younger women. Deeply entrenched attitudes and traditions justify men's easy access to women's bodies and result in the transmission of the virus via rape, incest, and other forms of coerced sex. In some areas where the control of women is reflected in traditional practices such as female circumcision and infibulation of the clitoris, the risks of acquiring the disease have multiplied. Thus AIDS expands the deadly impact of violence against women.

Cost to Society

Violence against women deprives society of the full participation of women in all aspects of development. According to one source:

*Female focused violence undermines widely held goals for economic and social development in the Third World. The development community has come to realize that problems such as high fertility, deforestation and hunger cannot be solved without women's full participation. Yet women cannot lend their labor or creative ideas fully when they are burdened with the physical and psychological scars of violence.*³⁴

The loss of time resulting from violence involves not only the victims, but the work time of police, and others in the legal, medical, mental health and social services.

It is almost impossible to quantify the total costs of the problem given the limited specific information reported on the extent of such violence. Among the few estimates made, the Australian Committee on Violence calculated that the cost of refuge accommodation for victims of domestic violence for the year 1986-87 was US$27.6 million. But, as one United Nations document states:

*Beyond such calculable costs lie the costs in human suffering, which are vast. The most significant long term effect and ultimate cost of wife battery, however, is the perpetration of the societal structure, confirmed by marital violence, that keeps women inferior and subordinate to men politically, economically and socially.*³⁵

Violence in an environment where public safety measures are inadequate and public transport unprotected, severely limits women's integration into the paid work force. Addressing this problem, a coalition of women's organizations in Bombay demanded the establishment of "ladies only carriages" in mass public transit after serious incidents of sexual harassment of women coming and going to work.³⁶ The Toronto Metro Action Committee on Public Violence Against Women and Children (METRAC) has raised awareness and affected public policy regarding the connections between transportation, safety, and women's participation in the work force in Canada. Based on an extensive survey of women's concerns about urban planning and design, they lobbied city government to improve lighting generally as well as in underground garages and on mass transit, and are suggesting new criteria and guidelines for all buildings and open spaces in the city. These initiatives are a reminder of how women's ability to use public spaces is often restrained by the way they are designed. Another example is the lack of adequate sanitation, water and garbage facilities: when women have to go to desolate places to satisfy such basic needs—a very common experience for women living both in shanty towns and in rural areas—they are vulnerable to all kinds of violent crimes.

Violence against women is often a direct obstacle to women's participation in development projects. For example, a revolving fund project of the Working Women's Forum in Madras almost collapsed when the most articulate and energetic participants started to drop out because of increased incidents of domestic violence against them after they had joined.³⁷ Faced with the same problems, the Association for the Development and Integration of Women (ADIM) in Lima succeeded in its work by initiating programmes that combined income generating schemes with legal aid to battered wives and women abandoned by their partners.³⁸

Even when women continue their involvement in development projects, concern about the problems caused by violence often diverts their energies from pursuing other goals. An action research project with women workers in the electronics industry in Peru carried out by Centro Flora Tristan unveiled widespread sexual harassment that the women had experienced in order to keep their jobs. Although one of the goals of the project was to increase women's participation in the electronics union, this was not possible until project leaders tackled the problems of violence that women experienced. Sometimes women miss meetings because of fear of beatings or physical disability due to injuries inflicted on them or because they are taking care of another battered woman or her children. Some women avoid public visibility due to shame over their injuries, understanding that society's "blame the victim" attitude would not create an environment sympathetic to them.

Another long term cost of societal violence against women, and of the cultural atmosphere that demeans women by condoning such violence, is that it denies developing countries the full talents of their women. Control and violence by male relatives can lead some of the best educated women to leave their countries, contributing to the brain drain in the Third World, and the loss of highly skilled women in the development process. Women who stay often must comply with the subordinate role that society assigns them and may be reluctant to be promoted for fear of upsetting their husbands. A number of development projects reported an increase in violence against female participants when husbands felt they were losing control of the household. For example, a report on domestic violence in Papua New Guinea states that:

Threats of violence control women's minds as much as do acts of violence, making women act as their own jailors. This means that a woman makes her choices not on what she wants to do or believes is best, but on what she thinks her husband will allow her to do.³⁹

IV. ERADICATING GENDER VIOLENCE: AN INVESTMENT IN THE FUTURE

Attempts to integrate women into development are doomed to failure if they do not address the issue of violence against women. This paper has attempted to build the case for the international development community's support of projects that address the various manifestations of gender violence as legitimate development projects. It maintains that projects dealing with violence towards women are building blocks for a more comprehensive, empowering and therefore sustainable effort which will tap women's full participation in the development process.

Directions for Programmes and Policy

Policymakers, development practitioners and others concerned with the consequences of development for women can take action at several levels in addressing the connections between gender violence and development.

The overall question, however, is how best to make use of limited resources to support projects that take into account and challenge the limitations and constraints that violence places on women's full participation in development activities. The answer lies in the catalytic role that development agencies and workers can play both at the programme and the advocacy levels.

A key contribution to be made by development agencies is that of highlighting the obstacles which gender violence places in the path of development, and identifying means of countering this in all phases of the project cycle.

With respect to awareness of the obstacles posed by gender violence, several types of intervention are possible:

- In the formulation and implementation phases of a project, an awareness of culturally specific forms of gender violence can help identify and overcome obstacles impeding women's participation. For example, the lack of safe transportation when women interact with unrelated males may require the identification of alternative means of travel which are viable in the local context. The reservation of "ladies only" cars in mass transit in Bombay, or obtaining the protection of the local khan for female health extension workers in Northern Pakistan represent such strategies.
- Also at the formulation and implementation stages, sensitivity to situations where changes in women's status make them vulnerable to violence is essential. It is a cultural truism that change is threatening. Project activities might seek to strengthen women's self-confidence and ability to defend themselves as well as reach out to men in the community, win their commitment to the change, and even change their expectations. Project activities have a responsibility to respond to incidents of violence that occur as a result of the process of empowerment. For example, at the United Nations Development Fund for Women (UNIFEM) project in Tempoal, Mexico, staff had to take time to work with husbands and community members when violence emerged as a result of project participants' changing roles.
- In personnel selection for the implementation stage, awareness of violence as an obstacle should be an important consideration. Project management requires not just technical skill, but an awareness of the larger environment and how it must be altered to facilitate women's full participation.
- Gender violence which obstructs development, as well as measures which reduce women's vulnerability to violence, need to be documented as they occur in the project cycle. It can be noted in periodic reporting, in staff monitoring visits, or in evaluations. The findings can be collected and analyzed as part of lessons learned from project experience.

Other types of initiatives include:

- Integrating statistics on gender violence into data collection, planning and training projects as a way of increasing the visibility and recognition of such violence as an obstacle to development.

- Finding sustainable ways of deterring gender violence through, for example, experimenting with techniques or interventions which focus on, or deal with, violence. With respect to deterrence, projects which document the extent and severity of violence against women, or which test one or more education campaigns and seek to make violence unacceptable within a society, can serve as models that demonstrate the possibilities and benefits of such approaches. In a similar way, projects dealing with the consequences of violence (rape crisis centres, training of police, magistrates, hospital personnel, etc.) should be supported, especially when they have some possibility of testing a new approach or of influencing the government to initiate services and expand on tested approaches to addressing gender violence.
- Increasing the capacity of women to identify and combat violence. Projects which strengthen communications skills, raise women's awareness of possible actions, build management skills, teach self-defense, and at the same time strengthen women's organizations contribute to enlarging the capacity of women to address gender-specific violence.

Advocacy

The international development community, and particularly women's agencies within that community, can promote important changes which require few additional expenditures beyond staff time. For example, by disseminating reports of projects concerned with violence, women's advocates can highlight the impact of violence on development programmes.

Overall, development agencies and organizations addressing women in development must conduct their programme and project work with an increased sensitivity to the issue of violence, and the ways in which development itself brings forth new forms of gender-based violence. It is important to address gender violence as an aspect of other types of development projects, such as income-generating schemes or housing plans, and not just those specifically focused on violence against women.

International development agencies such as UNIFEM, UNDP, the World Health Organization, and the International Labour Office, which are concerned with the issue of women in development, need to use their leverage and prestige as international agencies to expand the legitimacy and give voice to the groups working on these areas at the national or community level. In particular, they can support the initiatives and needs of women to exchange information and experience. Resources for research, publications and the development of alternative media which highlight the relationships between violence against women and development would also be useful.

Finally, strategies need to be developed which educate the media and public institutions and which sensitize the general public, including women themselves, on the disastrous personal and national consequences of continued violence against women. Countering violence against women is a major challenge for development practitioners. By doing it effectively, however, they can actively contribute to overall social and economic goals as well as helping women to realize their full potential. This is powerfully illustrated by the following quote from a popular education worker in Mexico:

When women explore their social roles, if the issue of violence doesn't arise, the workshop methodology is not addressing the issues of gender. We ask women to choose which experience of violence they would like to explore of those they have mentioned — children dying of hunger, battering, economic hardships. They usually choose domestic violence as they already understand and confront the other kinds of violence. To confront economic violence, they sell food or demand government subsidies. But there are other aspects of violence that they can't even talk about in their family, with their neighbors or in their organization. These forbidden themes are the basis of the work with gender. There is not much to discover about being poor. But as women look at what it means to be women (poor women), they gain the desire to live, learn to express themselves, they see how they are reproducing sexual roles in their children. They discover the causes of their oppression and are empowered to act.⁴⁰

ENDNOTES

1. There are many people that helped me throughout the process of writing this article. First and foremost I want to thank both Susan Holcombe, from UNIFEM, and Charlotte Bunch from the Center for Women's Global Leadership at Rutgers University. Not only did they come up with the idea of giving me this assignment but they also were thinking partners, and I benefitted enormously from their suggestions and recommendations. I also want to thank my colleagues at Rutgers, Niamh Reilly and Susana Fried, as well as the staff from UNIFEM, particularly Thelma Awori, Irene Santiago, Joyce Yu, and Claudina Correia who brainstormed with me about the ideas that helped me to develop the arguments. Thanks also to Elizabeth Reid from the Women in Development Unit at the United Nations Development Program (UNDP) and to the staff of the International Women's Tribune Centre in New York. The basic research for this paper was done under the sponsorship of the United Nations Development Fund for Women (UNIFEM).
2. Isis International, 1990.
3. Amin, F., 1990.
4. National Center on Women and Family Law, Information Package on Battered Women (No.47), 1988.
5. Roy, M., 1982.
6. Strauss, N.A., Gelles, R. and Steinmetz, S.K., 1981.
7. Langley, R. and Levy, R.C.
8. Stark, E. and Flitcraft, A., 1979.
9. National Center on Women and Family, op.cit.
10. MacLeod, L., 1990.
11. United Nations Centre for Social Development and Humanitarian Affairs, 1989.
12. Bradley, C., 1988.
13. AWRAN, 1985.
14. Instituto Latinoamericano de Estudios Transnacionales (ILET), 1990.
15. Ibid.
16. AWRAN, op.cit.
17. United Nations Centre for Social Development and Humanitarian Affairs, 1989. op.cit.
18. Sen, A.K., 1989.
19. United Nations, 1985.
20. United Nations, op.cit., paragraphs 76, 245, 271, 288.
21. United Nations Centre for Social Development and Humanitarian Affairs, op.cit.
22. UNDP, 1990.

23. Vasquez, R. and Tamayo, G., 1989.
24. Bruce, J., 1990.
25. AWRAN Report, op.cit.
26. Commonwealth Secretariat, 1987.
27. The New York Times, August 26, 1990.
28. Connell, R.W. 1987.
29. Jaffe, P., S. Wilson, and D.A. Wolfe, 1986.
30. "Step Isi" a video to reduce violence in the family in Papua New Guinea. Produced by the Women and Law Committee of the Law Reform Commission.
31. See for example The New York Times, August 12th 1990; and Buvinic, M. and Yudelman, S.W., 1989.
32. Bradley, C., op.cit.
33. Koop, C.E., 1989.
34. Heise, L., 1989.
35. United Nations Centre for Social Development and Humanitarian Affairs, op.cit.
36. This is based on the authors personal observation when visiting Bombay in 1987.
37. Noponen, H., 1989
38. Buvinic, M. and Yudelman, S.W., op.cit.
39. Bradley, C., op.cit.
40. De Mujer a Mujer, 1990.

REFERENCES

- Amin, F. "Breaking Our Bondage: Ending Violence Against Women." MATCH News. Jan-Mar. 1990.
- Ashworth, G., Of Violence and Violation: Women and Human Rights. London: Change, 1986.
- Australian National Committee on Violence. "Violence: Directions for Australia." Australian Institute of Criminology, 1990.
- Asian Women's Research and Action Network Report (AWRAN)*, Philippines, 1985.
- Bradley, C., "Wife-Beating in PNG — Is it a Problem?" Published in the Papua New Guinea Medical Journal, September, 1988.
- Bruce, J. "Home Divided." World Development, Vol. 17, No. 7, pp 979 - 991, 1989.
- Bunch, C., "Women's Rights as Human Rights: Toward a Re-Vision of Human Rights." Human Rights Quarterly. Vol. 12, No. 4, Nov. 1990.
- Buvinic, M. and Yudelma, S.W., Women, Poverty and Progress in the Third World. New York: Foreign Policy Association, 1989.
- Commonwealth Secretariat. Women and Development Program. Confronting Violence. A Manual for Commonwealth Action. Prepared by J.F. Connors, 1987.
- Connell, R.W., Gender and Power. Stanford: Stanford UP, 1987.
- De Mujer a Mujer. "Correspondencia," Mexico, August, 1990.
- Hanmer, J. and Maynard, M. (eds.) Women, Violence and Social Control. Atlantic Highlands: Humanities Press International, 1987.
- Hanmer, J., Radford, J., and Stanko, E.A. (eds.), Women, Policing, and Male Violence: International Perspectives. London: Routledge, 1989.
- Heise, L., "Crimes of Gender." World Watch, March-April 1989: 12-21.
- Instituto Latinoamericano de Estudios Transnacionales (ILET). Mujer/Fempress, Santiago, Chile, June 90, No. 104; Feb-Mar 90, No. 100; Nov. 89, No. 97 Especial "Contraviolencia" Dec. 88.
- Jaffe, P., S. Wilson and D.A. Wolfe. "Promoting Changes in Attitudes and Understanding of Conflict Resolution Among Child Witnesses of Family Violence." Canadian Journal of Behavioral Science 18:356, 1986.
- Koop, C.E., "Violence Against Women: A Global Problem." Address by the Surgeon General of the U.S. Public Health Service, Washington D.C., 1989.
- Langley, R. and Levy, R.C. Wife Beating — The Silent Crisis, pp 1-12. Dutton, 1977.
- Levinson, D., Family Violence in Cross-Cultural Perspective. Newbury Park: Sage Publications, 1989.
- MacLeod, L., Women and Environments, Vol. 12, No. 1, Fall 89-Winter 1990.
- Momsen, J.H. and Townsend, J., Geography of Gender in the Third World. Albany: SUNY Press, 1987.
- National Center on Women and Family Law. Information Package on Battered Women No. 47, New York, 1988.

- Noponen, H. "Grassroots Women's Worker Organizations-Rhetoric and Reality." Unpublished essay, New Jersey, 1989.
- Omvedt, G., Violence Against Women: New Movements and New Theories in India. New Delhi: Kali for Women, 1990.
- Perlez, J., "Toll of AIDS on Uganda's Women Put Their Roles and Rights in Question." New York Times 28 Oct. 1990.
- Report of the Queensland Domestic Violence Task Force, 1988.
- "Responses to Wife Abuse in Four Western Countries." Response, Spring 1985: 15-18.
- Reynolds, L., "Rape: A Social Perspective." Journal of Offender Counseling, Services, and Rehabilitation Fall-Winter 1984: 149-160.
- Roy, M., The Abusive Partner, unpublished manuscript, 1982.
- Russell, D.E.H., Sexual Exploitation. Rape, Child Sexual Abuse and Workplace Harassment. Newbury Park: Sage Publications, 1984.
- Sen, A.K., "Gender and Cooperative Conflicts." Persistent Inequalities. Women and World Development Ed. Irene Tinker. New York: Oxford UP, 1989. 123-149.
- Stark, E. and Flitcraft, A., "Domestic Violence and Female Suicide Attempts." Paper presented at the 107th annual meeting of the American Public Health Association. New York, November 1979.
- Straus, N.A., Gelles, R. and Steinmetz, S.K., Behind Closed Doors: Violence in the American Family. New York: Doubleday, 1981.
- United Nations Centre for Social Development and Humanitarian Affairs. Division for the Advancement of Women. Violence Against Women in the Family. Prepared by J.F. Connors, 1989.
- United Nations Development Program. Human Development Report 1990. New York: Oxford UP, 1990.
- United Nations. The Nairobi Forward-Looking Strategies for the Advancement of Women. Adopted by the World Conference to Review and Appraise the Achievements of the United Nations Decade for Women: Equality, Development and Peace. Nairobi, Kenya, 15-26 July 1985.
- Vasquez, R. and Tamayo, G., Violencia y Legalidad. Lima: Concytec, 1989.
- Walker, L.E.A., "Psychology and Violence Against Women." American Psychologist. April 1989: 695-701.
- White House Task Force on Infant Mortality Report, cited in The New York Times, August 12, 1990.

CENTER FOR WOMEN'S GLOBAL LEADERSHIP PUBLICATIONS

FROM VIENNA TO BEIJING

Publications which focus on Tribunals and other activities at the Fourth World Conference on Women (Beijing, 1995); World Summit on Social Development (Copenhagen, 1995); International Conference on Population and Development (Cairo, 1994); and UN World Conference on Human Rights (Vienna, 1993).

Without Reservation: The Global Tribunal on Accountability for Women's Human Rights, edited by Niamh Reilly. (1996) $15.00

From Vienna to Beijing: The Copenhagen Hearing on Economic Justice and Women's Human Rights, compiled by Mallika Dutt, Susana T. Fried and Deevy Holcomb. (1995) $10.00

From Vienna to Beijing: The Cairo Hearing on Reproductive Health and Human Rights, compiled by Mallika Dutt. (1995) $6.00

Testimonies of the Global Tribunal on Accountability for Women's Human Rights, Vienna 1993, compiled by Niamh Reilly. (1994) $15.00

Demanding Accountability: The Global Campaign for Women's Human Rights, by Charlotte Bunch and Niamh Reilly. (1994) $15.00

PAMPHLET SERIES

These working papers on Women and Human Rights are intended to promote international discussion of critical conceptual and strategic questions regarding women's human rights and the development of a human rights agenda that incorporates women's perspectives and experiences.

With Liberty and Justice for All: Women's Human Rights In The United States, by Mallika Dutt. (1994) $5.00

Gender Violence and Women's Human Rights in Africa (1994), articles by Asma Abdel Halim, Seble Dawit, Matlhogonolo Maboe, Molaru Ogundipe-Leslie, Nahid Toubia, and Abena Busia. $7.00

Gender Violence: A Human Rights and Development Issue, by Charlotte Bunch and Roxanna Carrillo. (Available in English, French and Spanish, 1991) $5.00

WOMEN'S GLOBAL LEADERSHIP INSTITUTE REPORTS

These books present the voices and perspectives of women around the world who came together to discuss women's leadership in areas of women's human rights at each of the Women's Global Leadership Institutes.

The Indivisibility of Women's Human Rights: A Continuing Dialogue, edited by Susana T. Fried. (1996) $15.00

International Campaign for Women's Human Rights 1992-1993 Report (1993) $8.00

Women, Violence and Human Rights: 1991 Women's Leadership Institute Report (Available in English and Spanish, 1992) $8.00

VIDEO

The Vienna Tribunal: Women's Rights are Human Rights!

The Vienna Tribunal highlights the moving personal accounts from women around the world who testified before a panel of eminent judges at the Global Tribunal on Violations of Women's Human Rights at the NGO Forum of the World Conference on Human Rights, Vienna 1993.

To order in the United States, contact:

Women Make Movies

462 Broadway 5th Floor, New York, NY 10013 USA

ph: (1-212)925-0606; fax: (1-212)925-2052

To order outside the United States, contact:

Augusta Productions

54 Mullock St. St. John's Nfld, Canada A1C2RB

ph: (1-709)753-1861; fax: (1-709)579-8090

To order the video in Spanish, contact:

SERPAJ-Mexico

Ignacio Mariscal 132, Colonia Tabacalera

Mexico D.F. 06030

ph: (52-5)705-0646; fax: (52-5)705-0771

The Center for Women's Global Leadership at Douglass College, Rutgers University, seeks to develop an understanding of the ways in which gender affects the exercise of power and the conduct of public policy internationally. The Center's goals are to build international linkages among women in local leadership that enhance their effectiveness, expand their global consciousness and develop coordinated strategies for action; to promote visibility of women and feminist perspectives in public deliberation and policy-making globally; and to increase participation of women in national and international governing bodies and processes.

The Center's activities are based on seeing women's leadership and transformative visions as crucial in every policy area from democratization and human rights, to global security and economic restructuring. Further, such global issues are interconnected and have both local and international dimensions. The creation of effective policy alternatives demands the full inclusion of gender perspectives and women in all decision-making processes, and requires an understanding of how gender relates to race, class, ethnicity, sexual orientation and culture.

Center for Women's Global Leadership

27 Clifton Avenue

Douglass College

Rutgers University

New Brunswick, NJ 08903 USA

For further information call:

1-908/932-8782 • fax: 1-908/932-1180

email: cwgl@igc.apc.org

Center for Women's Global Leadership
Douglass College, New Brunswick, New Jersey USA